Required / Elective: Elective	Pre / Co-requisites: -
Catalog Description: The role of social movements in bringing about political change in a globalizing world. Theoretical and empirical issues in the study of religious, ethnic, environmentalist, anti-globalist and feminist movements. New forms of organization, tactics and political ideas prompted by new social movements, rising since the 1960s.	Textbook / Required Material : The reading pack compiled by the instructor
Course Structure / Schedule: ( 3+0+0) 3 / 6 ECTS
Extended Description: This course provides an overview of how social movements have developed throughout the surge of the nation state, how they have been transformed towards a focus on culture and identity following 1960's, and how they are influenced by processes of globalization. Besides looking into the history of social movement activism, the course also discusses different theoretical approaches to social movements. How and why do social movements emerge? How do they organize? How do they act? How do they frame their claims? What is the role of values and identities in social movement activism? These are some of the questions through which different theoretical approaches to social movements will be discussed. The course underlines the transformation of social movement activity from national to the transnational and global level, and the effects of this process.
